Observations of persistent carrier states in colloidal suspensions find applications as high-precision sensors and chemical oscillators. Such a carrier state corresponds to macroscopic circulation in the colloidal medium, which is often exploited to develop new kinds of microfluidic pumps. In this work we show a kinetic theory of persistent carrier states in a two-dimensional assembly of a large number of Brownian particles. We find that the colloidal suspension always displays a stable periodic nonchaotic state, which we call a persistent carrier state. By taking into account the hydrodynamic interactions among the particles and using a Wigner distribution we derive the conditions for the formation of persistent carriers and we explain how the transition from weak to strong interaction between the colloidal particles switches the organization from a ballistic to an oscillatory circulation. The theories shown are confirmed by extensive computer simulations. Long-term results of laparoscopic sterilization for women with diabetes. Laparoscopic sterilization is an effective method for contraception in women with diabetes. There is minimal or no evidence for increased risk of the development of long-term complications of diabetes in patients undergoing the procedure. The records of 281 diabetic women undergoing laparoscopic sterilization between 1986 and 1992 were reviewed. Diabetes was diagnosed either before or during the procedure. The charts of all 281 patients were reviewed retrospectively. Of the 281 patients, 80% underwent laparoscopic sterilization before, and 20% after, diagnosis of diabetes. The occurrence of surgical complications was compared with 50 consecutive charts of women undergoing sterilization by laparotomy; age, parity, type of diabetes, and interval from diagnosis to surgery were similar. Early complications occurred in 12% of patients undergoing laparoscopic sterilization, in 9% of patients undergoing sterilization by laparotomy ( $p = 0.57$ ). There were three immediate conversions (1%), two for bleeding (1%), two for missed tubal anatomy (1%), one for pelvic adhesions (0.4%), and six for ectopic gestation (2.09e8f5149f
