this give you the opportunity to make sure that students are exposed to student-centered and -based learning? How does it ensure that every student has a chance to be self-directed and to cultivate perseverance? How does it contribute to alignment of instructional efforts with the real world of work? How does it develop creativity? How does it create and nurture a community of learners? How does it engage learners in strategies for improving their use of technology for learning and in our profession? How does this give you the opportunity to make sure that students are exposed to "student centered and -based learning"?
Inherently, all these ideas and potentials of virtual learning are reported to be part of the development and employment of ICTs. Future vision and pathways In 2016, The Guardian suggested that the home computer's biggest contribution to society in the 21st century was playing music, though this was from a general point of view. In a more focused opinion piece, The Guardian reported that the home computer had continued its role in the field of education, and now had an even greater role to play, as it has taken on the role of the gateway to learning for teachers and other providers of education, as well as for students and parents. The area of education in which the home computer had played the biggest role was in the area of literacy and numeracy, particularly with the development of interactive, online learning platforms, together with mathematics and the science, and with the development of the internet itself. The digital computer is now set to surpass the printed page in education as the primary source of information for students and teachers. The effect of the digital computer also extended beyond the classroom and into the homes of children, as it became the primary home computer for many homes. In this new context, the home computer had matured sufficiently to enhance a curriculum and develop its own culture. In terms of a curriculum and culture in the field of education 82138339de
